BY J. H. C. The fact versified in the following lines were originally published in the Trinity (Cal.) Times, and may be relied upon as authentic.]

Begone, begone! ill-mannerd hound What fiend hath sent thee here To rouse me with thy dismal yells Upon a night so drear?

Thus from his bed the farmer spoke Then turned again to snore, But all in vain, the dog without Howld louder than before.

And still the more the man complained The brute the noisier grew,
And, leaping, shook the oaken door
As he would burst it through!

Then up at lenght the farmer rose And donned his gear in haste-There seems a mystery here, he yawned That should be fairly traced.

He drew the bolt, wide swung the door, And, ere he could retreat, A lordly mastiff, bounding through, Crouched, whining, at his feet.

Thence to the gate returning oft, The intruder seemed to say In eager phrase, "Come come with speed And I will lead the way!"

This dog is mad, the farmer cried. Or else some ill's abroad; I'll forth with him; and soon they climbed The winding mountain road.

Lit by the stars, where trackless snows, Deep drifted by the wind, Fill many a gorge, round may a cliff Their dubious path they find. [crouched,

At length the dumb guide paused and With piteous cry and low, Before a dark and stirless heap, Half b ried in the snow.

Too late, too late! the farmer groaned, As from the icy mold He raised a form both tall and fair But stiff and stark and cold!

Unpitying Heaven! say for whose crime She thus untimely fell-Her name, her home, her errand here, What mortal tongue can tell?

One scanty garment, frozen too, Was all that wrapped her clay: The rest, a bundle firmly rolled. Untouched, beside her lay.

Alas! what crazy freak was this? The astonished rustic cried, To fling, on such a piercing night, Thy warmest weeds aside!

While yet he spake, the faithful dog That bundle had unwound, And in its folds, all plump and warm, A rosy babe was found!

Oh, depth of a fond mothers's love! All self she could resign And calmly yield a ripened life, Frail germ, to purchase thine!
